THE NEW YORK, CHICAGO & ST. LOUIS RAILROAD COMPANY,

Petitioner,

NICK MASIGLOWA,

Respondent.

BRIEF OF RESPONDENT
In Opposition to Petition for Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals For the Sixth Circuit.

The Petition for Certiorari in this case seeks review of the judgment of the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit entered by that Court in this cause on October 8, 1956. The Court of Appeals judgment affirmed the decision of the United States District Court for the Northern District of Ohio, Eastern Division in which the District Court refused to set aside the jury verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $4,000 and direct a verdict for the defendant.

OPINIONS BELOW.

The opinion of the District Court is officially reported in 135 F. Supp. 816. The Court of Appeals did not render an opinion.

QUESTIONS PRESENTED.

In respondent's view, petitioner's statement of the questions presented by the present case is inadequate and misleading. The issue with which petitioner's question attempts to deal should be stated as follows:

Whether in an action brought under the provisions of The Federal Employers' Liability Act, the defendant is entitled to a directed verdict where the evidence disclosed that the company was short handed of car repairmen's helpers and the plaintiff and his fellow workman, both car repairmen's helpers, were being hurried by their superiors to obtain material, and where pursuant to being hurried they carried an excessive load, the weight of which, together with the fact that the fellow workman subsequently dropped his end of the load, resulted in injuries to the plaintiff?

STATEMENT OF CASE.

The respondent was employed as a car repairman's helper at the petitioner's Conneaut, Ohio shops (R. 6). Helpers assist car repairmen by bringing them the material they need to perform their work (R. 7), and car repairmen have the authority, without getting the permission of their foreman, to order helpers to get them any materials or supplies which they need (R. 54).

On March 14, 1950, the date of the accident which is the subject matter of this action, the respondent was teamed with another helper named Dean Hackenburg, a man approximately 40 years of age (R. 9). Hackenburg was a big man, just under six feet in height and weighing about 228 pounds (R. 52). The respondent, on the other hand, was a relatively small individual being approximately five feet six inches in height and weighing about 160 pounds (R. 9). The respondent, a man 54 years of age, was also considerably older than his co-worker, Hackenburg (R. 6).

On the date of the accident there was a heavy snow on the ground, and it was also probably snowing at the time (R. 9).

Respondent and Hackenburg were assigned to assist between twelve (R. 10) and twenty (R. 53) carmen by bringing them materials which they needed to perform their work (R. 10). Normally about five to six helpers were assigned to assist the carmen in this area (R. 9, R. 53); however, on the date of the accident there were only three, including respondent (R. 10).

Due to the fact that there was a shortage of helpers (R. 43, R. 47), the carmen were all waiting for materials to do their work (R. 11, R. 14), and for that reason "everybody was hollering" at the respondent and Hackenburg to bring them materials (R. 11, R. 14, R. 47). Respondent's exact testimony on this point was as follows:

> "Q. Was there more than one gang that asked for it?
> A. There was more than one gang because everybody was waiting for stuff.
>
> Q. Did they holler to you?
> A. Well, we don't have a chance, but we bring in that one place and we have to go to another place, to bring what they need." (R. 11.)

At the time of the accident, certain carmen had ordered the respondent and Hackenburg to get linings for the inside of a railroad car. These linings were boards about 7/8" thick, 5 7/8" wide, and 18' long, weighing about 18-20 pounds (R. 12). They were tied four in a bundle (R. 13). Respondent and Hackenburg went to the shed in which the linings were located. Because of the pressure being exerted on them to hurry, because the carmen were all waiting for material (R. 43, R. 47), and because the carmen were all hollering at them (R. 47); Hackenburg suggested he and respondent carry three bundles (R. 14). Respondent had never carried three bundles before (R. 14), but because of the urgency of the situation and the shortage of help (R. 43), they attempted to carry three bundles (R. 41, R. 46). Respondent's testimony with regard to the reason three bundles were carried was as follows:

> "The Court: You ordinarily would take one bundle at a time, wouldn't you? Did I understand you to say this was the first time you had carried three bundles in one load?
> The Witness: That's on account of shy help and everybody was waiting for work—I mean everybody was waiting for material—well, you have to do maybe more than you are supposed to." (R. 43.)
>
> "The Court: What other things were there besides the talk you had with this man that induced you to decide to carry the three bundles instead of one or less than three?
> The Witness: Well, we was shy of help, and everybody was hollering for material." (R. 46-R. 47.)

The testimony of petitioner's witness, Hackenburg, varied from the respondent's testimony with regard to how many boards were carried and with regard to whether or not there was a shortage of helpers (Hackenburg could not recall). However, on cross examination it became clear that Hackenburg was a hostile witness and his memory with regard to what happened was very confused. He stated under direct examination that he and respondent only carried one bundle of lining; however, on cross-examination he admitted that he and respondent may have carried two bundles (R. 69). He admitted that he may have told Mr. Stern, one of respondent's attorneys, that he and respondent carried two or three bundles (R. 56). He admitted that he might have told Mr. Stern that there were not over eight boards in a bundle (R. 57). He stated that the stack of lumber they carried was about 8 inches high [since the boards were ⅞" thick, this would mean that they carried at least 8 boards or two bundles] (R. 67). He admitted that shortly after the accident he gave a statement to the effect that he did not recall how many boards were carried (R. 65). Hackenburg also admitted that, taking respondent's strength into consideration, three bundles were too much weight for himself and respondent to carry (R. 66).

In its statement of facts the petitioner indicated that respondent and Hackenburg had a conversation regarding the best method of transporting the lumber [Petitioner's brief page 4]. Actually their conversation was very brief and was concerned with not just the best method, but mainly the quickest method (R. 45-46). The reason for the conversation and their subsequent action is summed up in the following testimony of the respondent:

> The Witness: Well, we was shy of help, and everybody was hollering for material." (R. 47.)

The bundles were stacked on the ground (R. 14). Hackenburg first picked up one end of them, putting the end on his shoulder. Respondent then picked up the other end and while so doing he felt something crack in his back (R. 15). Respondent and Hackenburg carried the linings about 200 feet to the car (R. 39), and then Hackenburg dropped his end in the car (R. 15). This left the little man (respondent) carrying the whole load of approximately 216 to 240 pounds, and this sudden increase in weight and severe jolt caused respondent so much pain (R. 15, R. 39) that he was forced to drop his own end of the load to the ground (R. 39). Respondent's testimony showed negligence on Hackenburg's part in the manner in which Hackenburg dropped his end of the load. Respondent's testimony is as follows:

> "* * * A. When he got to the car he drop his end and I drop my end on the floor because my eyes can't move.
> Q. Did you carry it?
> A. We carried it as far as the car and he drop his end. If he put maybe a little easier it probably wouldn't be hurting my back. And he drop his end in the car, and I was on the other end and I have to drop mine because I couldn't hold it any longer. I got blue, and I went into the lunchrcom just—I don't know, maybe twenty feet." (R. 15.) (Emphasis added.)

That respondent sustained a serious and permanent injury to his back is not questioned.

ARGUMENT.

A. The Right to a Jury Trial.

Under the American system of jurisprudence, it is a basic and fundamental right of a plaintiff in a negligence case to have all issues of fact tried by a jury. This Court has recognized and emphasized the importance of submitting to the jury questions of fact arising in actions brought under the Federal Employers' Liability Act.

In Bailey v. Central Vermont Ry. Co., (1943) 319 U. S. 350, at page 353, Justice Douglas said:

> "The right to trial by jury is a 'basic and fundamental feature of our system of federal jurisprudence.' Jacob v. New York City, 315 U. S. 752. It is part and parcel of the remedy afforded railroad workers under the Employers' Liability Act. Reasonable care and cause and effect are as elusive here as in other fields. But the jury has been chosen as the appropriate tribunal to apply those standards to the facts of these personal injuries. * * * To deprive these workers of the benefit of a jury trial in close or doubtful cases is to take away a goodly portion of the relief which Congress has afforded to them." (Emphasis added.)

This Court, in Blair v. B. & O. R. Co., (1944) 323 U. S. 600, stated as follows:

> "To deprive railroad workers of the benefit of a jury trial in close or doubtful cases is to take away a goodly portion of the relief which Congress has afforded them."

This Court has for many years made it clear that as long as the jury system is the law of the land and the jury is made the appropriate tribunal to try disputed questions of fact, this Court will protect that right. In Tiller v. Atlantic Coastline R. Co., (1943), 318 U. S. 54, at page 67, this Court, by Justice Black, said:

"No case is to be withheld from a jury on any theory of assumption of risk, and questions of negligence should under proper charge from the court be submitted to the jury for their determination. Many years ago this Court said of the problems of negligence, 'We see no reason, so long as the jury system is the law of the land, and the jury is made the tribunal to decide disputed questions of fact, why it should not decide such questions as these as well as others.' Jones v. East Tennessee V. & G. R. Co., 128 U. S. 443, 445." (Emphasis added.)

This rule of law was set forth as follows by this Court in Lavender v. Kurn, (1946), 327 U. S. 645; at page 653:

"It is no answer to say that the jury's verdict involved speculation and conjecture. Whenever facts are in dispute or the evidence is such that fair minded men may draw different inferences, a measure of speculation and conjecture is required on the part of those whose duty it is to settle the dispute by choosing what seems to them to be the most reasonable inference. Only when there is a complete absence of probative facts to support the conclusion reached does a reversible error appear. But where, as here, there is an evidentiary basis for the jury's verdict, the jury is free to discard or disbelieve whatever facts are inconsistent with its conclusion. And the Appellate Court's function is exhausted when that evidentiary basis becomes apparent, it being immaterial that the court might draw a contrary inference or feel that another conclusion is more reasonable." (Emphasis added.)

The scope of the issues to be entrusted to the jury was again set forth recently by this Court in Schulz v. The Pennsylvania R. Co. (1956), 350 U. S. 523, wherein Justice Black said:

"In considering the scope of the issues entrusted to juries in cases like this, it must be borne in mind that negligence cannot be established by direct, precise evidence such as can be used to show that a piece of ground is or is not an acre. Surveyors can measure an acre. But measuring negligence is different. The definitions of negligence are not definitions at all, strictly speaking. Usually one discussing the subject will say that negligence consists of doing that which a person of reasonable prudence would not have done, or of failing to do that which a person of reasonable prudence would have done under like circumstances. Issues of negligence, therefore, call for the exercise of common sense and sound judgment under the circumstances of particular cases. '(W)e think these are questions for the jury to determine. We see no reason, so long as the jury system is the law of the land, and the jury is made the tribunal to decide disputed questions of fact, why it should not decide such questions as these as well as others.' Jones v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co., 1888, 128 U. S. 443, 445, 9 S. Ct. 118, 32 L. Ed. 478." (Emphasis added.)

B. There Was Sufficient Evidence of Defendant's (Petitioner's) Negligence to Require Submission to the Jury.

In the instant situation there was ample evidence of negligence to require submission to the jury. There was direct testimony indicating the following:

1. The company was short handed of carmen's helpers on the day of the accident. The normal number was six, but on the day of the accident there were only three (including respondent) to assist about 20 carmen.

2. Due to the fact that they were short handed, Hackenburg and respondent were hurried by the carmen when they went for lining.

3. As a result of the pressure from the car repairmen, Hackenburg suggested that they carry three bundles and respondent reluctantly followed his lead. As respondent picked his end up he felt pain in his back.

4. After respondent and his co-worker, Hackenburg, had carried the lumber to the railroad car, Hackenburg dropped his end of the load jarring respondent severely and leaving respondent, a relatively small man, supporting a load of 216-240 pounds himself. From respondent's testimony, it was clear that his co-worker had dropped his end of the lumber quite hard and that respondent might not have been so severely injured if Hackenburg had put down the lumber more carefully. Respondent stated as follows on direct examination:

"* * * If he put maybe a little easier it probably wouldn't be hurting my back." (R. 15.)

5. On the day of the accident there was a heavy snow on the ground and, giving the plaintiff the benefit of any inference from the facts as we must on a defendant's motion for a directed verdict, it may be inferred that the carts could not be used. There is no evidence that adequate equipment was available which could be used in the snow.

It is interesting to note that the plaintiff's counsel in his petition for certiorari has failed to discuss or mention the grounds of negligence set forth in item 4 above, and, in addition, he has failed to cite any cases which would indicate that the facts set forth in item 4 would not constitute negligence which was attributable to the petitioner.

Items 1 through 5 above set forth ample evidence from which a jury could have reasonably inferred that the petitioner was negligent. Under these circumstances, it is not the function of a court to search the record for conflicting evidence in order to take the case away from the jury. This rule of law was clearly and concisely set forth by this Court in Tennant v. Peoria & P. U. R. Co., (1944) 321 U. S. 29, the Court at page 35 said:

> "It is not the function of a court to search the record for conflicting circumstantial evidence in order to take the case away from the jury on a theory that the proof gives equal support to inconsistent and uncertain inferences. The focal point of judicial review is the reasonableness of a particular inference or conclusion drawn by the jury. It is the jury, not the court, which is the fact finding body. It weighs the contradictory evidence and inferences, judges the credibility of witnesses, receives expert instructions, and draws the ultimate conclusions as to the facts. The very essence of its function is to select from among conflicting inferences and conclusions that which it considers most reasonable * * *. That conclusion, whether it relates to negligence, causation, or any other factual matter, cannot be ignored. The courts are not free to re-weigh the evidence and set aside the jury verdict merely because the jury could have drawn different inferences or conclusions or because judges feel that other results are more reasonable." (Emphasis added.)

All of the facts in the instant case comprise a situation to be appraised in its entirety. The shortness of help, the heavy snow, the urgent demands for materials from respondent's superiors, and the dropping by Hackenburg of his end of the load, when considered together clearly paint a picture from which a jury might have inferred that petitioner was negligent. As stated in Stone v. N. Y. C. & St. L. R. Co., (1953), 344 U. S. 407:

> "The experience with stubborn ties, the alternative ways of removing them, the warning by petitioner that he had been pulling as hard as he could, the command of his superior to pull harder, the fact that more > men were usually used in these circumstances—all these facts comprise the situation to be appraised determining whether respondent was negligent. Those circumstances were for the trier of the facts to appraise."

In Blair v. B. & O. R. Co., (1944), 323 U. S. 600 at page 604, this Court stated the rule as follows:

> "The negligence of employer may be determined by viewing its conduct as a whole. * * * And especially is this true in a case such as this, where the several elements from which negligence might be inferred are so closely interwoven as to form a single pattern, and where each imparts character to the others."

Such a situation exists in the instant case. The several elements from which negligence might be inferred are so closely interwoven as to form a single pattern.

The District Court's opinion in the instant case referred to a "well-reasoned decision" by Judge McVicar in Whitted v. Aliquippa & Southern Ry. Co., (W. D. Penn.), 112 F. Supp. 599. The facts in the Whitted case are very similar in many respects to those in the instant case. In that case, the plaintiff was injured while carrying a 14 foot switch tie with only four men, where six men were required. It appeared that the four men were not ordered to carry the tie, but did so because they were short handed that day. The defendant denied it was negligent and asserted that the plaintiff contributed to his injury in the manner in which the tie was lifted and in failing to request more help to carry it. The court held that there was sufficient evidence to support the jury's verdict for the plaintiff.

In a decision handed down only six months ago, the District Court for the Western District of Pennsylvania in Constantine v. Aliquippa and Southern Ry. Co., 144 F.

Supp. 39 (1956), analyzed the province of the jury with respect to the drawing of inferences of negligence. In that case the court held that the jury could reasonably conclude that the failure of the defendant railroad to provide the plaintiff with sufficient man power constituted an unsafe place to work and was the proximate cause of his injury. The court said:

> "The choice of conflicting versions of the way the accident happened, the decision as to which witness is telling the truth and the inferences to be drawn from the uncontroverted facts and the controverted facts are questions for the jury. If there is a reasonable basis in the record for concluding that it was negligence of the employer which caused the injury, it would be an invasion of the jury's function for the court to draw contrary inferences or to conclude that a different conclusion would be more reasonable. Thomas v. Connemaugh and Black Lick R. Co., 3 Cir., 234 F. 2d 429.
> "Upon recapitulation of all the credible evidence, I am convinced that the quantum of proof is such that a jury could reasonably conclude that failure of defendant railroad to provide plaintiff with sufficient man power constituted an unsafe place to work and was a proximate cause of his injury * * *" (144 F. Supp. at page 41).

In the instant case, acts of negligence on the part of the petitioner have been established. The shortage of help, the hollering for materials, the orders to hurry on the part of the respondent's superiors, the initial suggestion on the part of Hackenburg, and the dropping of his end by Hackenburg, all contributed to respondent being injured. There was indeed substantial and abundant evidence in the instant case warranting the jury determining that the petitioner was negligent.

C. There is No Conflict of Authority Among the Courts of Appeals Requiring Settlement by This Court.

Petitioner claims that this Court should take jurisdiction because there is a conflict between the decision of the Sixth Circuit in the instant case and the Seventh and Fifth Circuits. Petitioner relies on Jackson v. Illinois Northern Ry., 224 F. 2d 76 (1955), and Wadiak v. Illinois Central R. Co., 208 F. 2d 925 (1953), decided by the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit and Texas & Pacific Ry. Co. v. Thompson, 232 F. 2d 313 (1956), decided by the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit. All three of these cases rest on their special facts. Only one of these three cases (Wadiak v. Illinois Central R. Co., supra) even remotely resembles the facts in the instant case, and even that case lacks any reference to the main grounds of negligence in the instant case, i.e. the element of respondent being hurried by his superiors, and also the factor of Hackenburg dropping his end of the lumber.

Basically there is no conflict in the principles of law set forth in the above three cases and in the instant case; although with respect to one phase of the Wadiak case it might be in conflict in some degree with the decision of this Court in Lavender v. Kurn, supra, and the recent case of Schulz v. Pennsylvania R. Co., supra, and with the decision of the Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit in Thomas v. Connemaugh and Black Lick R. Co., 234 F. 2d 429 (1956).

An analysis of the factual situation in the three cases relied on by the petitioner will indicate the inapplicability of these cases to the instant case.

With respect to Texas and Pacific R. Co. v. Thompson, supra, decided by the Fifth Circuit, the Court of Appeals held that the District Court should have directed a verdict for the defendant because the plaintiff had failed to offer any proof whatsoever of her basic charge of negligence. In that case, part of the regular duties of the plaintiff required her to handle mail. The sole basis of negligence alleged in her complaint was "that the handling of the unusually large mail on that date (December 3rd) was beyond her physical strength and that she asked her employer for help which it refused." (232 F. 2d, at page 313). The District Court submitted the case to the jury on this claim of negligence, refusing the railroad's request for a directed verdict, and the jury returned a verdict for plaintiff. The Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit reversed on the ground that the plaintiff had failed to offer any evidence to sustain the basic charge in her complaint. The Court of Appeals said:

> "Appellee offered no evidence at all to sustain the basic charge of her complaint that she asked for and was refused assistance in handling the 'unusually large quantity of mail' on the date of her injury."
> "The court below submitted the case to the jury on that charge of negligence alone, using almost identical language. Appellee was asked several times if she requested any additional help or asked certain named individuals to help her, and she stated categorically that she did not ask any help * * *" (232 F. 2d at pages 315, 316.) (Emphasis added.)
>
> "At all events, taking appellee's own statements and drawing therefrom all permissible inferences, there is no tendency on the part of the evidence to sustain the charge quoted above that she had on December 3rd requested assistance in unloading an unusually large quantity of Christmas mail and had been refused such assistance. By basing her complaint on this allegation and by placing it before the jury as the sole charge of negligence, she recognized that, under the law, she had no case unless she could sustain this charge of negligence." (232 F. 2d at page 316.) (Emphasis added.)

It could hardly be claimed that a decision of the Fifth Circuit based on a theory that the plaintiff failed to offer any evidence of negligence could be in conflict with the decision of the Sixth Circuit in the instant case in which there was proof of several elements of negligence. It is, therefore, submitted that there is no conflict in authority between the Fifth and Sixth Circuits.

Although the facts in the instant case are much stronger for the respondent on the question of negligence than in the Thompson case, it must be noted that this Court has already granted certiorari to the plaintiff in the Thompson case. (October Term, 1956, No. 321.)

As far as the decisions of the Seventh Circuit are concerned, these decisions also rest on their particular facts. In Jackson v. Illinois Northern Ry. Co., supra, the plaintiff picked up a large piece of frozen sand and suffered a hernia when the piece crumbled in his hands and he lurched forward. The plaintiff at the time was furnished with a pick and shovel and he could easily have broken the lump of sand into smaller pieces before picking it up. The plaintiff just made a poor decision. The choice was strictly his own. He was not influenced by any outside or superior forces and there was no pressure on him of any kind. No one instructed the plaintiff in the Jackson case to pick the frozen sand up with his hands, there was no evidence of his being hurried in his work, there was no evidence of his being short-handed, nor was the negligence of a fellow servant involved. In view of the particular factual situation in the Jackson case, there is no conflict of authority between the decision of the Seventh Circuit in that case and the Sixth Circuit in the instant case. In addition, there is no conflict between any proposition of law decided by the Seventh Circuit in the Jackson case and those set forth by the lower courts in the instant case.

The third case relied on by the petitioner is Wadiak v. Illinois Central Ry., supra, decided by the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit. The dissimilarity in the factual situation between the instant case and the Wadiak case is immediately apparent. In the Wadiak case, six barrels had broken loose in a railroad car. The plaintiff and a co-worker used a chain hoist, jack and block to lift five of the barrels. Then they decided to lift the sixth barrel manually although the chain hoist, jack and block were still in the car and available for use. In the instant case the evidence disclosed that there was heavy snow on the ground and it may be inferred that the carts were not available for use on that day. At least it was a question of fact for a jury to determine. Furthermore, the testimony throughout the instant case points up the fact that they were short-handed. A further factor is that Wadiak was a car repairman whereas Masiglowa was a car repairman's helper and was subject to the orders of the car repairmen who were all hollering at him to bring materials. In addition to all this, there was the very important factor in the instant case of the negligence of a fellow servant when Hackenburg dropped his end of the load severely jarring respondent and leaving him supporting the entire weight himself.

In view of the essential differences between the decision of the Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit in the instant case and the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit in the Wadiak case, it is difficult to see how the petitioner can claim that this Court should take jurisdiction of the instant case because of a conflict of authority between the Seventh and Sixth Circuits.

It is also important to note that in the Wadiak case the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit based its opinion to a considerable extent on the fact that the jury should not have been permitted to speculate on the reasons the barrels broke loose. The decision on this point appears to be somewhat in conflict with the decision of this Court in Lavender v. Kurn, supra, wherein the opinion of the court stated that it was the province of the jury to exercise a measure of speculation and conjecture in order to choose what "seems to them to be the most reasonable inference." See also the recent decisions of Schulz v. Pennsylvania R. Co., supra, and Thomas v. Connemaugh and Black Lick R. Co., C. C. A. 3, 234 F. 2d 429 (1956).

In view of the fact that the lower court decision in the instant case did not set forth any rules or principles of law regarding speculation or conjecture by the jury, there cannot be any basis for claiming that there is a conflict of authority between the Court of Appeals Sixth Circuit and the Court of Appeals Seventh Circuit on this point.

In view of the above, there appears to be no basis for this Court assuming jurisdiction in the instant case.

CONCLUSION.

There was ample evidence from which the jury could have inferred that the respondent was injured as a direct and proximate result of the petitioner's negligence; and therefore, it would have been improper for the District Court to have invaded the province of the jury and substituted its judgment for theirs.

There is no conflict of authority between the decision of the court in the instant case (Court of Appeals, Sixth Circuit) and the decisions of the Fifth and Seventh Circuits which require settlement by this Court. The best that can be said is that the petitioner contends that the decisions of the courts below are erroneous. Even if this were so, it would not afford the basis for an assumption of jurisdiction by this Court.

For the foregoing reasons, respondent submits that the petition for certiorari should be denied.
